Dan Hally has spent over a decade managing exploration and development operations. He has a unique knowledge and understanding of narrow vein structures and how to build a successful plan to move projects into production. He has 30 years of leadership and management experience and previously served as a Captain with a Sheriff's Office in Washington State. He utilizes his skills as an investigator to uncover valuable information about potential targets in the historic Warren Mining District. His ability to problem solve and get things done are critical to being successful in bringing the Warren District back into production. Dan has several years' experience working with the United States Forest Service in Fire, Timber and Recreation Management. He graduated from Lewis Clark State College in Lewiston Idaho with his bachelor's degree in Justice Studies and obtained his master's degree in Organizational Leadership at Gonzaga University. He proudly served in the United States Army as a Combat Engineer. Dan has a strong commitment to protecting the environment and has spent a lifetime enjoying the mountains of Idaho.
